TODAY'S EDITORIAL

Teacher Group's Answer Still Leaves Some Questions

We want to call your attention to the letter in today's "What Our Readers Say" column because it is a carefully considered, responsible answer to our editorial in this space last Monday. (If you haven't already read it, please do so now before continuing this editorial.)

We would, however, like to take some exceptions to statements in the letter.

First, we deny categorically that the public has "learned to expect the medical profession to withdraw its services from any hospital, public or private, where standards of administration are detrimental to the best interests of patients and medical practice." We think the public reception of the recent announcement by some New Jersey doctors that they would not treat patients covered by the Medicare program is the best illustration. It was greeted with amusement, disbelief and revulsion.

The professional, in our opinion, does not have the right to abandon the individual, be he patient or student, for "general" improvement.

Second, our editorial did not advocate that the association "stand aside" in protection of professional careers and the educational welfare of the children. We believe CTA should work harder than ever for these goals. We do not believe that blacklisting a school district is a professional way to do it.

Incidentally, how does the CTA end sanctions? After a year or two of sanctions, which most educators seem to feel would be necessary for them to be fully effective, how does CTA tell everyone that everything's all right now?

Can CTA contact all the thousands of people who will have been told over a year or two that a district "condones unacceptable personnel practices"? We in journalism, at the request of educators and others, don't identify young children in trouble because it "gives them a bad name they can never live down." Can CTA give a district a bad name and not have its affects go far beyond the offense? In some ways, a strike is a cleaner cutting tool; you can tell when it is on and when it is off.

Third, a sentence in the letter worries us. It says "many of our members are no longer content to accept a completely subservient relationship to the public." We are not clear just what this means. Don't they want to work for the public anymore? Don't they want to teach the things the public wants taught? What sort of a relationship do they desire?

And let's get one more thing straight. We have observed at close range and from afar the operation of CTA Commissions. We think them highly dedicated, competent and effective. We would hate to say or do anything that would make them less effective.

But we don't like sanctions. We don't like blacklisting. We don't think they are professional weapons.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Teachers' Assn. Answers Editorial EDITOR,

Independent-Journal:

Some of our members among your subscribers have asked that we express our reaction to your June 11 editorial, "CTA Action Does Harm to Teaching as a Profession."

We are not surprised that soft melodies on the telephone and light announcement of the sanctions policy of the CTA has caused some concern. We agree that such a policy has inherent dangers like those ise. And the crackling fire in the barbe- you describe if sanctions were to be employed capriciously. cue pit is the kind of spring music that It now is the association's responsibility to demonstrate that drastic pressures will not be exerted for trivial reasons.

As you point out, the general policy for invoking sanctions has existed for approximately seven years. Five years ago the association adopted detailed rules and procedures for expulsion of members or application of other sanctions against individual member who had, by their conduct, damaged the teaching profession and failed in their responsibilities as a professional teacher. These have been applied in a few in-

The new policy adds clearcut procedures for use of sanctions against districts. In two instances prior to this year, the CTA asked that teachers be informed about employment conditions in the district before they accepted employment, and in one case administrators were asked not to apply for the superintendency of a district until the community had reached its own decisions regarding composition of the governing board. The new policy simply is more specific and gives added protection against reckless use of this power. Communities have learned to expect the medical profession to withdraw its services from any hospital, public or private, where standards of administration are detrimental to the best interests of patients and medical practice. In such cases, the medical profession exercises its expertness to determine standards of hospital operation. We consider this a fulfillment of professional responsibility,

It should be pointed out that the imposition of professional sanctions against a district is radically different from collective bargaining with the strike as the ultimate weapon. Sanctions cannot be applied against a district by the local teachers group. The decision is made by a statewide professional agency after serious study.

'LET'S DO AWAY WITH OLD CLICHES'

The sanctions, when applied, do not immediately interrupt the educational program for the community's children, but they do make a dramatic appeal to publi opinion, which is the ultimate

CTA commissions frequently conduct studies of situations in which the standards of operation are so detrimental to pupil interests and the professional status of teachers that the educational program suffers and professional careers of those who accept employment are jeopardized. With rare exceptions, an objective report gives the board and the community the information and incentive to correct the evils reported. Occasionally those in authority choose to attack the report fession will be enhanced. and ignore the problems.

When an impasse of this nature arises, our members in the district plead for additional help toward creating an environment in which they can perform their professional services. The association could stand aside and assure members that the schools may be just as bad as the local citizenry will tolerate. I could refrain from attempting to protect professional careers and your editorial considers "pro- county supervisors.

The roles of the public and the profession in school operation never have been clearly defined; now they are questioned more than normally. It may be a sign of a maturing profession, or it may be a general change in public opinion, ut many of our members are not longer content to accept a completely subservient relationship to the public.

I have confidence that our leadership is of such calibre that it will not permit the association's strength to be used capriciously. Restrained performance in the next few years will, I'm sure, offer adequate reassurance in this re-

Being in the round in the tiny theater, players sometimes find themselves eye to eye with someone of the audience. At one point, Bishop Pike leaned over and straightened the collar of acting pastor Werlin.

Unperturbed, Werlin told Bishop Pike "thank you" and went on with the show.

After the play, according to Director Earle M. Marsh, both Pike and Dempsy, referring to the scene where the priest sanctioned the murder of a character, said to each other, "He must be one of yours." Marsh told the clergymen, "Let's make him a Luth-

WE VISITED an old clam digger the other day who owns a sway back horse and rolls his own cigarettes.

He is Anthony Connell. Born in San Francisco's Butchertown, he has lived on the cove near the Tiburon trestle since 1904. He raised clams until 1940 when, he said, the Richardson Bay Sanitary District put in a plant nearby and spoiled the clams.

Connell's black horse was standing by some weeping willows just looking. Named Blackie, according to Connell. The horse is from Kansas. He is a cutting horse, eats rolled oats and a little hay and does not like to go into a barn. He is about 33. "He looks pretty good yet," said his owner.

Connell rolled a cigarette from tobacco in a can of Prince Albert and said the state has bought some of his property to widen the highway, but left his house, which was once a houseboat and stands on stilts:

GRAY FOG hung over do."

IN SAUSALITO things are Richardson Bay and some sticks, once used to keep sting rays out of the clam beds, could be seen poking up out of the water. "I sold clams in San Francisco at two cents a pound before the earthquake," said Connell. "After the earthquake, it was six cents." Sometimes he dug 400 pounds in a day.

The eight houses and huts in the cove will be torn down for the highway. We left the genial former clam digger who was baking a potato in his stove and went out into the wind. Blackie was standing by the green hut, his mane askew, not doing anything in particular.

STAN KELLY and Tom Zink struggled to haul a big, tipsy, man through the Sausalito City Council chambers into the police station last Tuesday. Said the man being hauled: "Where are you taking me? Where? Where?" Said Kelly: "I'm getting too old for this kind of thing." And from the audience, laugh-

She disdained squirting the bird with a hose. Thursday she used a mirror.

HANGING THE BIRD'S cage on a tree, Mrs. Livingston put the toy mirror outside and started talking "a blue streak." All of a sudden, Baby Doll hopped onto his landing gear, into the cag and pop went the door.

Mrs. Livingston was estatic. "Not a feather out of place after 10 days," she said, "He's just fine." At home Baby Doll said "What did you do?" to Mrs. Livingston. Mrs. Livingston thanked Miss Tilly. "The bird, even though outside, wants sanctuary," said its owner, "the same as we

A NIXON victory in California would immeasurably strengthen the Republican party's progressive wing. It would mean that the 1964 nominee would almost certainly be drawn from Gov. Rockefeller, George Romney, or Nixon himself.

A Nixon defeat would strengthen the Republican's ultra - conservative wing because it would put California's Republican party control into right-wing hands. It would erase Nixon from elective politics, with no influence on the
